

Health Data Collected Without Individual Consent

This information brief summarizes, in table form, state statutes and rules that require or authorize health care providers or facilities, insurers, or government agencies or entities to collect or disseminate health data on identifiable individuals without their consent.

Minnesota Statutes and Rules contain numerous provisions for collecting health data on individuals without their consent. Some of the statutes expressly state that consent is not required. Others are silent, implying that consent isn't needed.

The purpose of statutes like these may include the following:

- identifying carriers of communicable disease and providing them care or notifying their contacts
- obtaining the most complete possible samples of individuals with given health characteristics for research purposes or public health planning
- enforcing criminal and regulatory laws
- improving state laws and policies in particular areas
- verifying the appropriateness of health care payments

Some people object to some health data reporting laws on grounds that they deny individuals the ability to control the release of information about themselves or their minor children. The public policy question involves a balance between promoting public health research or services and fostering individual autonomy.

Federal regulations affect the state's ability to obtain certain health data on individuals. Pursuant to the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA), federal limits have been imposed on the release of individually identifiable health information without the patient's consent or authorization. For purposes of this information brief, there are limitations on statutes that authorize rather than require certain data sharing. The table in this report indicates when a statute that authorizes health data release (1) may conflict with HIPAA regulations or (2) may be permitted by HIPAA regulations. 45 C.F.R. 160 and 164.

The health data statutes and rules described in this report are organized alphabetically by subject. The statutes are summarized first, followed by the rules. The table provides information on the following topics:

- the type of data being reported
- who is authorized or required to report the data
- whether reporting is mandatory or optional
- who receives the reported data
- the purposes for reporting the data
- whether, and the extent to which, data may be further released without the subject's consent
